Course Content:

The course will consist of topics relating to a range of aspects of Australian cinema from the early twentieth century to the twenty-first century. Each topic will include a screen text as an example that will be used to impart knowledge and understanding of developments in and aspects of Australian cinema. Secondary reading will serve to convey ideas and generate debate about aspects of Australian cinema. Topics to be explored include early cinema, international filmmaking in Australia, the industry’s revival in the 1970s, market-driven entertainment, the relationship to television, and recent developments. Screen texts to be studied include historical examples, high-profile productions and other significant works. Screen works are examined in themselves and in relation to their contexts. Themes of ethnicity, class and gender are addressed. The course fosters understanding of Australia’s relationship to international screen production by presenting an overview that includes regional and urban stories, government-funded productions and works targeted at various audiences. A detailed weekly schedule and text list will be provided at the beginning of the teaching period.
